Liam Gallagher is facing renewed legal pressure in New York as a court prepares to scrutinize the vast earnings from his band Oasis' blockbuster 2025 reunion tour, reopening a long-running child maintenance dispute that could expose the full scale of his recent fortune.

RadarOnline.com can reveal a hearing is due later this month after Liza Ghorbani, 51, the mother of Gallagher's daughter Gemma, 12, filed a fresh motion seeking access to his latest financial records.

Oasis Reunion Windfall Under Scrutiny

The case centers on the fallout from Oasis Live '25, the sold-out reunion world tour by Liam, 53, and his older brother Noel Gallagher, 58, which is estimated to have generated more than $445 million overall. Ghorbani is now asking the New York Supreme Court to compel Gallagher to disclose bank statements, tax returns and credit card records to reassess child support arrangements first settled in 2015.

She is seeking about $635,000 a year, arguing the Oasis tour has transformed his financial position and that Gemma's needs have changed.

Court Push For Full Financial Disclosure

The scale of the tour's success looms large over the dispute. Oasis' 1994 debut Definitely Maybe has sold 15 million copies worldwide, and the reunion shows built on that legacy.

Ticket sales alone are estimated at roughly $385 million, with a further $51 million from sponsorship and merchandise.

Lawyers for Ghorbani have filed an application for an Order to Show Cause, asking Judge Jeffrey Pearlman to compel further disclosure during the discovery phase.

A new hearing date has been set for later this month.

“Another New York lawyer, Dror Biket, warned resisting disclosure in his lovechild maintenance case could backfire on the outspoken rocker. Biket added: ‘He could face financial penalties, and the severest punishment is incarceration. If he doesn’t hand over his financial details, there could be consequences.’”

Lawyers Warn Of Serious Consequences

New York family lawyer Morgan Mazer said the scope of disclosure could be broad.

She said: “Ms. Ghorbani can get access to the tour merchandise sales, if it’s a side thing Mr Gallagher is earning money from. Ms Ghorbani will want to look at any employment and income, any perks that Mr Gallagher has.”

Mazer added: “Credit card statements are relevant because some people don’t always show all their income on their tax returns. With the credit card statements, you can glean what somebody is making based on their lifestyle.

“The powers to determine what you should pay in child support are broad.”

Gallagher Bristles As Stakes Rise

A source close to Gallagher sought to play down the dispute, saying: “Liam has been concentrating on spending the holidays with his family rather than dwelling on the legal wrangling. He believes he has acted fairly and generously over the years and is backing his lawyers to handle the matter.”

Gallagher has three other children and has previously bristled at the claims from Ghorbani.

After she filed a lawsuit in March, he criticized her on X as a “gold digger” and shared a link online to The Beatles’ 1963 song Money (That’s What I Want).

Another New York lawyer, Dror Biket, warned resisting disclosure in his lovechild maintenance case could backfire on the outspoken rocker.

He said: “When the accountants sink their teeth into it, people are in for a ride.”

Bikel added: “He could face financial penalties, and the severest punishment is incarceration. If he doesn’t hand over his financial details, there could be consequences.”

The lawyer also cautioned against Gallagher issuing public insults against Ghorbani, saying it was “never a good idea” because “courts don’t like those kinds of things.”

Court filings show Gallagher has paid more than $953,000 in child maintenance since 2015 and later agreed to cover about $229,000 for Gemma’s schooling and autism-related expenses.

Ghorbani now wants roughly $648,000 a year and lives with her daughter in a Manhattan apartment costing about $4,200 a month, with requests including $28,600 a month for a house with a pool, $95,000 a year for a live-in nanny and a $6,350 annual holiday budget. ■
